

Yummy Geography: Polynesia

(I want to boldly go)farther than any man has been before me. James Cook By the end of the last Ice Age (roughly 11,000 years ago), all the inhabitable continents had been settled. South America was last, probably receiving its first humans just as the ice was beginning to retreat. Many assume that Australia, because of its isolation, was only recently settled, but people have lived in Australia for around 40,000 years. Only the Pacific, roughly 1/3rd of the earth's surface, lacked people. (For Dr. G says see p. 11) Most of the Pacific islands lacked vegetation and animals that could provide enough food for a human population. The people who were to settle this final frontier, therefore, had to be farmers..and they had to take their domestic plants and animals with them. Without a doubt, many early settlement efforts failed, but if crops could be planted and animals released, subsequent settlement efforts had a much better chance of survival.
